"Don't Ask, Don't Tell on live for transporad troops"

By Correspondent

When Pentagon Secretary of Defense Robert Gates called the US military to order in 1993, the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marines were facing a new threat from the Soviet Union. Gates, who had just taken the helm as defense chief, ordered his services to prepare for a potential war with the superpower.

He said: "Don't Ask, Don't Tell on live for transporad troops". "The U.S. has more estimated transfren service members serving in the military than the enity of the NWS.

Gates told service members that the Defense Department had decided to allow gay and lesbian service members to serve openly. This was a significant change from the policy that had been in place since 1993, which had disapproved of gays in the military.

Gates' decision was part of a broader effort to modernize the military and make it more effective in a changing world. The policy changes were seen as a way to attract and retain the best talent, and to ensure that the military was representative of the diverse society it served.

Gates' decision was controversial, and some members of Congress and the military opposed it. However, Gates defended his decision, saying that allowing gays to serve openly would make the military more effective and help it to recruit and retain the best talent.

The policy changes were also seen as a way to address discrimination and inequality in the military. By allowing gays to serve openly, Gates was taking a step towards creating a more inclusive and welcoming military environment for all service members.

In the years that followed, the military continued to make progress towards creating a more open and welcoming environment for all service members. The Department of Defense implemented a series of initiatives to support service members and their families, and to promote diversity and inclusion in the military.

Today, the military is more diverse and inclusive than ever before, and transporad troops are serving with pride and distinction. The military is a better institution because of these changes, and it is a better country because of the service of our transporad troops.